Dear Hiring Manager,

I am applying for the CRM Coordinator role at Inflection Club. The posting describes the CRM as the operational backbone of the member and prospect pipeline, where every contact and deal stage has to be accurate and purposeful. That is the discipline I practice daily inside BBVA Argentina's CRM and internal systems, where a stale or duplicated record is an operational problem, not a cosmetic one.

BBVA is itself financial services, so the compliance-bound discipline around that data is not new to me. Decentralized Masters describes accountability as being measured against one standard: independently verified, real-world results. I read CRM accuracy the same way: a pipeline report only holds up if the data under it can be trusted without a second check.

What I would bring to owning that pipeline:

- Daily CRM discipline: I keep contact records, interaction history and classifications accurate inside a banking CRM while resolving over 50 queries and guiding over 100 customers a week, so data integrity is a habit, not a policy I was handed.
- A reporting instinct, not just data entry: I designed and shipped my own analytics dashboard on real BigQuery data, with KPI tracking and an AI-generated daily summary, so I read CRM data as the input to a dashboard someone else relies on.
- Spreadsheets and SQL for segmentation: I am completing the Google Data Analytics Professional Certificate, built around cleaning, deduplicating and segmenting datasets with SQL and spreadsheets against defined criteria.

On the note you asked for: the CRM system I know best is a banking CRM and the internal systems it connects to, not HubSpot. The closest I have to a process improvement owned end-to-end is catching duplicate or inconsistent records before they turn into a customer-facing error, rather than redesigning a workflow from scratch; I have not yet led a formal CRM workflow or automation build, and I would rather name that now than imply otherwise.

I would welcome the opportunity to discuss how I can contribute to keeping your member and prospect pipeline accurate.

Kind regards,

Bianca Dondero
