Dear Paul,

I'm applying for the Social Media Manager role at Twelve Rivers Realty. I'm based in Argentina, write in advanced English and native Spanish, a plus for a market like Austin's, and my day runs on a schedule that overlaps comfortably with US Central time. Real estate content is not new territory for me: I spent two years supporting content and social media for an online real-estate platform, so I already know what makes a listing post or a market comment worth stopping for.

Twelve Rivers takes its name from the rivers that shaped Austin's own street grid and builds its service style around being local rather than corporate, and that is the same direct, no-corporate-filler energy I want to bring to your captions and replies.

Here is how my experience maps to what you need:

- Real estate & conversion writing: at Inmobiliatica.com I supported content and social media for a real-estate platform judged on inquiries generated, not likes, the same standard your captions and replies need to hit.
- Daily posting, consistently: as a Community Manager I planned and shipped 15 posts a month on Instagram and Facebook for three consecutive summer seasons, writing each brand account into its own voice rather than one generic tone.
- Real-time engagement: at BBVA I resolve 50+ customer queries a week live, staying warm and fast under volume, and I managed local brand social accounts end to end, so keeping a comment section answered quickly is a habit, not a stretch.

I'll be honest about where I'd be building: I haven't managed LinkedIn as a channel or a founder's personal voice before, only Instagram and Facebook for several local brands, each with its own established identity. Both are a direct extension of what I already do, and I'd treat the paid test task as the fastest way to show I can pick up your voice and tone quickly rather than ask you to take it on faith.

A weekly show with a real audience and a live comment section is exactly the kind of pressure I want in a role: fast, specific, and judged on whether people actually engage, not on vanity numbers. I'd welcome the chance to talk.

Kind regards,
