Dear Hiring Manager,

I am applying for the Marketing & Sales Support Coordinator role. The half-and-half split is the reason I want it: writing the newsletter and scheduling a week of LinkedIn content, then building prospect lists and making sure nothing in the pipeline goes cold. I have done both sides, content in an agency setting and CRM and follow-up discipline inside a bank, and I would rather own the whole loop than one slice of it. As requested, I have attached one piece of my own writing with this application.

What I would bring to your first weeks:

- Content that ships on a calendar: as Community Manager I planned, wrote and scheduled 15 posts a month across three summer seasons, keeping tone and branding consistent for several brands at once. The same rhythm applies to LinkedIn for the company and for you as founder, and to newsletters where open and click rates tell me what to write next.
- Writing built to get a reply: my copy at Inmobiliatica.com was judged on enquiries generated, not likes. That is the standard I apply to subject lines, follow-ups and email templates, and I hold it in English as well as Spanish.
- Funnel hygiene as a habit: at BBVA I run daily CRM operations and close over 50 cases a week, which means lists get cleaned, records stay current and every follow-up has an owner and a date. Booking discovery calls with full context is the same discipline pointed at your calendar.

One thing to be straight about: I have not run B2B outbound campaigns in Smartlead, so outreach sequencing tools are something I would learn during the six-month ramp-up rather than bring on day one. What I already have is the writing, the CRM habits and the appetite to learn a stack properly, including Claude and Claude Code, which I already use to draft and iterate on content faster.

I work fully remotely from Mar del Plata, Argentina, one hour ahead of New York, so US business hours are a normal working day for me rather than a compromise. I am also studying Marketing at Universidad CAECE, and I structure my week around a fixed working schedule.

I look forward to hearing from you.

Kind regards,
