

Bianca Dondero

biancadondero@gmail.com | +54 223 583-5084 | LinkedIn

September 9, 2026

Dear Simera hiring team,

I am applying for the Influencer Marketing Specialist role supporting your U.S.-based client. I should be direct about the main gap first: the posting asks for at least two years specifically in influencer marketing, and I do not have them. What I do have is three seasons running brand accounts on Instagram and Facebook, writing the briefs and guidelines that content gets made from, coordinating deliverables and timelines with people outside my own team, and reporting on what actually performed.

Simera places Latin American professionals inside U.S. teams and handles payroll and compliance, so the hire works like an in-house one. That is the arrangement I want: one brand, one campaign calendar, time-zone overlap with the team, and ownership judged on results.

Here is what I can take off your client's plate from week one:

- Sourcing and outreach: researching high-fit creators on TikTok, Instagram and YouTube, then opening and holding the conversation. At BBVA I speak with over 100 people a week and resolve over 50 queries; first contact and steady follow-up are daily work for me.
- Briefs and creative direction: I already write campaign messaging and content guidelines so someone else can produce work that sounds like the brand, then review it for quality and alignment and ask for revisions when it misses.
- Keeping campaigns on schedule: 15 posts a month per account, three seasons running, means calendars, deliverables and approvals that do not slip, and the records and trackers behind them.
- Performance analysis: I track reach and engagement per piece and use it to pick the next month's formats, and I am finishing the Google Data Analytics certificate to do that with SQL and spreadsheets.

What I would need to learn is the creator-side machinery: rates, agreements, and how ambassador and UGC programmes run at scale. I am studying marketing while working full time, so building new skill on top of a working week is normal for me.

I am based in Mar del Plata, work in English every day, and my hours overlap fully with U.S. teams. I look forward to hearing from you.

Kind regards,

Bianca Dondero